PARTICIPATION IS FREE OF CHARGE

APPLICATION DEADLINE: 11 OCTOBER 2016

Microbial communities inhabiting the human gut play an important role in metabolic health and also contribute to the development of metabolic diseases. Specific microbial species and the characteristics of the total community may affect inflammation and metabolism in the host. Exploratory studies in humans and mechanistic studies in animals are used to elucidate these interrelations.

We have attracted some of the most prominent scientists within a multitude of scientific disciplines, including nutritional science, microbiology, clinical science and bioinformatics, to provide insight into this highly relevant topic. We invite you to participate in an exciting two-day event with several opportunities for scientific networking.
